Advertising For Celery Is Urged By Sales Expert

Assessment On Each Crates Advocated As Way To Get Fund To Explain Merits Of Product Grown In Sanford

Advertising is costly. There are a number of firms in this country that spend several million dollars annually for their individual advertising programs. A great many manufacturers spend several thousand dollars year after year to keep their products before the public. They don't do this from vanity, through a desire to see their name in print, but because they have found it necessary to advertise in order to build up an increasing demand for an increasing production. And if they don't increase production, they give competitors an opportunity to seize their potential market with a substitute article. The celery market is capable of great expansion if we go after it or we can sit back and watch our competitors supply with substitutes the demand which we could have for celery.

MONDAY, JULY 2.

GRIEF

By O. M. Drunk. In the New York Herald Tribune I have no words, you have no tears. Our grief. Too terrible for ears or words, averts. Not even a gesture of despair. No words. We offer knowing Time the thief that caused us in the web of things. Half. Cannot not with dawn or sunset. More and more. These close and lock down the long corridor. Our two lives seem a bound ungarlanded sheet. Perhaps, in some dim place beyond the stars. We shall, as it is written, meet again. And learn the meaning of the riddle there. Burned free by fire from these hot furnace bars. I shall ascend, made gentler by much pain. And you, if that could be, more wise and fair.

The Fort Myers Tropical News is Democratic to the core. It prints a picture of Al Smith under the head, "The Next President!"

Sanford has been doing some building too. At the end of the first twenty days of June, the records showed over $31,990 in permits issued.

"Friendship" makes Wales, the way The Sanford Herald stream lined the landing of Miss Earhart in Europe. The news also made Miss Bell wail.—Lala Worth Herald.

It now turns out that Senator Curtis, although a Methodist now was baptized a Catholic. That should tend to remove the religious question from this election if nothing else has.

Miami could get rid of Al Capone, if it really wanted to do so. Palm Beach Independent. Yeh but Capone is paying as much for protection as Ed Ballard or as much ever as Ed Bradley, we reckon.

It's hardly necessary to print the full text of any convention speech, people all over the nation are hearing them at once over the radio.—Leesburg Commercial. Radio is making a dent in a lot of our "news," isn't it.

A Detroit rum baron has been killed. Coming so closely on the killing of Tim Murphy, it would seem to indicate that the gangsters are in a fair way to exterminate themselves without the necessity of outside interference.

Arthur Brisbane says that those who promoted a revival of race tracks in Chicago are responsible for much of that city's crime, whether they know it or not. Those that promoted a revival of race tracks gambling in Florida have sold out of the picture.—Ocala Star.

Miami is having more trouble getting rid of Al Capone than it has in attracting a hundred thousand other visitors.—Gainesville Sun. It's funny to us that if Al really went there just for the climate why he didn't change his name to Vanastorbil of Asbury Park, and then he would have had the whole town at his feet.

Our telegraph correspondent declares, "There were some diehards among the Southern States, of course, Texas, Alabama, Georgia the two Carolinas, and Florida were recorded as casting no votes for Smith. The traditional notion to make the combination of the New York governor unanimous way not offered. Tammany leaders apparently didn't care to push their luck too far."

Old time Floridians and Florida travelers will regret the passing of the St. Johns river steamers. Once the trip between Sanford and Jacksonville was a joyous journey. Slow, but happy was not the sole consideration then, and the scenery, the comfortable boats, and the splendid cats, made a delightful combination. But good roads and the automobile—and exit river steamers—St. Petersburg Times.

A Fallen Leader

The shouting and tumult die and the Democratic convention passes into history. The party, with a manifestation of unprecedented harmony, has met, adopted a platform, selected a presidential ticket and adjourned in less than a week's time. The smooth-working convention machinery is in noticeable contrast to the conglomeration of opposing forces in the historical meeting four years ago in New York. So determined were party leaders to have harmony, they immediately squelched what little discord might have been offered by the bone-dry element, and with gentle persuasion succeeded in soothing the South in an impending factional fight.

Throughout the convention the groups in power worked with precision. Nothing was done out of turn, no action was taken that would arouse the antagonism of others. Diplomacy was the watchword. Throughout all these proceedings the powerful influence of Al Smith can be traced. The completeness of his domination serves to emphasize more the passing from the Democratic picture of another figure, once so powerful in the party councils that his influence held a convention in deadlock through more than one hundred ballots.

There is something pathetic about the departure of William Gibbs McAdoo. From the seats of the mighty to political obscurity has been his experience in the short space of four years. Fate, with every element of its uncertainty, has played a big part in the life of the former cabinet officer, making him the leader of his party and yet without sufficient strength to become its standard bearer.

Eight years ago at the San Francisco convention the mantle of Wilson leadership was to have passed to the shoulders of McAdoo. He had the President's endorsement but he lost the opportunity and James M. Cox, comparatively unknown in national politics, became the nominee. In the interim between, 1920 and 1924, Woodrow Wilson went out of office and then passed away. A great portion of the party flocked to McAdoo. He became the most powerful figure in its councils and four years ago entered the convention with a majority of the votes. But the spectre of fate again hovered over him in the memorable deadlock, with his defeat as an ultimate consequence.

Always with the best interests of his party at heart, the former cabinet officer some months ago made a commendable gesture toward Democratic harmony by withdrawing from the field of potential candidates for the nomination. His statement on that occasion revealed the futility of his position and the disappointment to his personal ambitions. With it he said good bye and good luck to the party.

The fate of Mr. McAdoo must be a bitter disappointment to him, a severe blow to his personal pride, but in the final analysis it is just another example of the grim uncertainty of politics, an element which reveals the futility but intense fascination of the game.

True To Form

The report from Paris that Harry K. Thaw, notorious profligate, had run amuck when trying to crash an annual art ball will not come as a surprise to many Americans who have followed the lurid and tempestuous career of this "bad actor." Recently barred from England where his reputation had preceded him, the slayer of Stanford White went to France where the more liberal Frenchmen, displaying more courtesy than caution, allowed him to disport himself in their country.

With characteristic disregard for conventions and a total lack of gentlemanly conduct, Thaw, dressed in a loin cloth and leopard skin, became obnoxious and aroused the ire of some students awaiting entry to the ball. A melee ensued and the Paris police had to be called upon to bring order.

Thus was completed another chapter in the history of our most famous moral delinquent. Having gotten away with murder, insanity, the biting of rabbits and other eccentricities in his own country the imitable Harry hied himself to Europe in quest of further deprecations. It is pleasing to learn that he received a sudden jolt on the jaw if not to his ambitions, and it is to be hoped that the Paris authorities will have better luck in meting out justice.

It is regrettable, however, that one of our citizens, be it ever so lamented in this country, should be allowed to visit a foreign land to ruffle the friendly feelings which men like Lindbergh have done so much to establish. England should be congratulated for being wise enough to keep Thaw out; France should be pitied for having him as their visitor; and America should be mortified that its courts proved so ineffectual in restraining the unmoral and unlawful activities of Harry Thaw.

Again as Senator Norris would say, "you can't convict $100,000,000"—not in this country.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE

OCALA STAR

The people of Florida by their votes have nominated candidates to represent them in the legislative halls at Tallahassee next April. Whether they have chosen wisely remains to be seen. We prefer to look on the bright side and have hopes of better things for Florida when the lawmakers again gather under the capitol dome to make and—blessed be—hope some of the laws their predecessors made. We must not, however, expect the impossible from these men who we are sending to Tallahassee next spring. Our past extravagances must be paid for. The state and the various counties must continue to pay, for some years to come, for public improvements that have been made and for the mistakes of those who went before.

Nearly every count in Florida, Marion included, is heavily bonded for highways and schools. These bonds must be retired and the only way they can be paid is by direct taxation for interest and principal. Complaints about high taxation will continue to be heard, for both state and county millage probably will be raised when the budgets for the coming fiscal year are made up. The state is behind right now with its current expenses, running on money borrowed from other funds which show a surplus and a higher millage, which will be fixed some time next month is almost inevitable. In fact, the Star has been told by a member of the governor's cabinet that there is no other way out. But there is a ray of hope ahead. When the legislature meets the cry of economy and curtailment of expenses will go up in the land and we have abundant faith in the spirit of the men who will assemble in Tallahassee next spring. They were elected, almost without exception, on an economy platform and the distinguished Floridian who will then occupy the chief executive's chair stands for economy with a big "E."

What measures will be advocated to reduce the public expense, we do not know, but as an indication we point to the suggestion brought out in the campaign by James M. Carson, one of the candidates for governor. Mr. Carson believes that part of the immense revenues now going to the state road department should be diverted to the counties in which bond issues were voted for the construction of state highways, those in the preferential system and others which were taken over by the state for maintenance after they had been built entirely by the counties. Our state road building program has been carried on at express speed; in fact, it seems to have been prosecuted almost too rapidly. Good roads are a necessity and the Star does not favor putting a brake on the state road department, but it is not necessary to go at road building too hastily or too extravagantly. Most of the main highways have been completed, or will be within the next few months. The only way that the burden of taxation for the retirement of bond issues already authorized can be relieved is for the state to help those couplets which have contributed large sums toward the construction of trunk line highways. With proper safeguards, thrown around such legislation we see no reason why the principle should be taken advantage of by other counties which have not bonded to construct state highways. Taking a small part of the gasoline tax for retirement of county bond issues already expended on state roads, would not affect the state road building program to any appreciable extent. Only three cents of that tax goes to the state at the present time. When some workable system for financing the schools has been devised that extra cent tacked on by the 1927 session could be returned to the counties, thereby reducing taxes, property values would again be brought back to normal and a more

BOY AND DOG

ST. AUGUSTINE RECORD

This isn't an editorial, but just a little story that deserves to be passed along. It concerns a boy and a dog. Also policemen and firemen.

The boy's name is Johnny and the dog's name is Jiggs. They live in Erie, Pa. The other day Jiggs fell through an open manhole into an eight-foot tube that runs under the city, carrying the water of an old creek. Johnny ran to that manhole and peered into the darkness for Jiggs. Jiggs was not visible. So Johnny promptly toppled in after him.

People who had seen it ran up and peered in and became excited. Dog and boy were both gone. There was only the echo of their voices and the sound of swiftly rushing water. Undoubtedly both were drowned. They called the police and firemen, who went a long opening manholes—but no Johnny.

Half an hour later a boy incredibly wet and muddy crawled from the other end of that tube, three miles away, climbed up the bank of the road and hailed a passing automobile. The driver eyed him doubtfully, but took him in.

When Johnny got home, his mother didn't bawl him out. She just threw her arms around him and hugged him till the muddy water oozed all over the floor.

"I'm all right," said Johnny happily, "but I couldn't find Jiggs."

"Poor old Jiggs," cried neighbors, trooping in.

"Poor old Jiggs," echoed the firemen.

"I'll go in for him," said one of them. The others tied a rope to let him down. They kept paying out that rope for about a mile and a half, then the pulling stopped. They hauled in, and at last came the bedraggled fireman with Jiggs in his arms, moaning feebly. And that's all there is to the story.

If the Mark Twain Association establishes its chair of humor in college it will make a mistake. Toledo Blade.
