TALLAHASSEE — There will be no wild pheasant hunting on the Aggies. In exchange, in Florida, at least not in the immediate future. Yet, by 1966 very few birds remained and indicated that the population could not sustain itself without additional stocking.

According to R. W. Murray, wildlife biologist in charge of the pheasant study, there was some thought during the early days of the research that the hird might become established. Birds were seen frequently following release and the survival was apparently good over the winter months. There was some natural reproduction during the spring following release. However, band returns occurred as far as six miles from the release site and by summer most birds had simply dis-

This dispersal is believed to have curtailed reproduction since it lessened the chance of opposite sex encounter during the Phila'phia

These areas, however, have been characterised by intensive grain type agriculture with as much as 70 per cent of the land being in preduction, particularly Oakland

Results of the six year research program point out that the blackneck pheasant will survive and reproduce in Florida cally in areas of extensive grain production and that suitable habitat is the limiting factor for this pheasant in Florida.
Only in very few localized areas in the northern section of the state is desirable habitat found. Considering this localized element and the fact that more land is being taken out of grain production, it is desirable that Florida will have a pheasant population in the immediate future.

In commenting on the results of the research, James A.
Powell, Chief of Game Management Division, said, "Although the blackneck pheasant is not adaptable to Florida the pregram provided us with much valuable information. Many times
