Public Drunkenness

The Herald would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Judge Wilkinson upon his determination to rid this city of drunkenness. In passing a law upon recent offenders, Judge Wilkinson said: "When a man repeatedly becomes so intoxicated that he is unable to walk, he must remain on the streets. The streets of this city must be made safe for our wives and children. Elderly residents of Sanford remember, this too will be the days when every corner heated its air with swinging doors and boisterous drunks. They remember too when the sight of unregenerate men staggering down the sidewalk on their way from one saloon to another was so common that respectable women hesitated to appear on the streets at all without an escort. No one wants to see those days return."

In the former saloon era the problem of drunken driving was unimportant. Most of the driving done in those days was behind old wooden wheels, and it mattered little if a driver became so drunk that he could be depended upon to bring him safely home. Such drunken driving as there may have been in the latter days before prohibition, when automobile driving was just becoming a thing, was limited to such a small percentage of the population as not to constitute a serious menace to the public. Practical experience has shown that the danger of drunken driving is not in the fact that a driver is drunk, but in the fact that he is drunk and driving a motor car. It is not always possible to tell when a driver is drunk, and it is not always possible to tell when a driver is drunk and driving a motor car. It is not always possible to tell when a driver is drunk and driving a motor car.
