Flynn No Flop Despite Famous Error

only eaten a hearty dinner, he had put away a fine break-fast, too, and he was ready now for that longest walk of all, the one through the clubhouse. Doug Flynn decided he'd take that walk the only way he knew how. He'd do it naturally. So there was the customary smile on his face when he came into the Mets' quarters before their doubleheader with the Cardinals at Shea

He had committed a critical and deeply embarrassing error the day before, a costly bobble which enabled the. Cards to tie the score in the ninth inning and then go on to win the game, 8-6, in the 12th. The usually sure-fingered Mets' second baseman generally acknowledged the smoothest defensive performer at his position in the National League, had allowed Mike Phillips' routine two-hopper to go right through his legs for his first error in 40 games.

That should've been the second out, but with only one out and the Mets still ahead, 6-4, Garry Templeton followed with a triple to left-center to make it 6-5 and Leon Durham's subsequent sac fly brought in the tying run.

St. Louis wrapped up the game three innings later on a walk, a sacrifice, Ken Oberkfell's triple and Mike Ramsey's single, after which Flynn patiently answered all kinds of questions by the media. His teammates, true to the code of all ballplayers, hadn't said very much to the dejected Flynn then, but now, some 16 hours later, they were ready for him. "Where's your glove?" right fielder Joel Youngblood asked Flynn, poking his head in his locker and pretending he was looking for it. "Whadd'ya mean?" Flynn answered puzzled. "Throw that sucker away," Youngblood instructed. "It finally missed one. At least we found out you're human.

Flynn laughed. First baseman Mike Jorgensen, who had made a sterling stop on Oberkfell's wicked smash with a man on second and one out to keep the Cardinals from going ahead in the 10th, was the next to pay his compliments to Flynn after Youngblood had finished with him. "It's just a game," he smiled, perfectly aware he was employing one of baseball's oldest platitudes. "Forget it." Jorgensen couldn't help grinning. Flynn smiled right along with him, realizing he was being kidded. It was the typical kind of gallows humor ballplayers use on one another in the clubhouse, and in a sense, Flynn welcomed it because it showed his teammates really were with him,

The Mets-Cards game on Saturday had been televised nationally and after it was over and Flynn had gone home, he received a call from his father and mother who had seen the game on TV in Lexington, Ky. "They told me it was a shame it had to be on national television," Flynn said, still smiling. "I told them, 'Well, you know, I didn't do it on purpose.'

"There wasn't anything I could do about it after it happened. I ate a good dinner. Ribs for an appetizer, salad, shrimp cocktail and a big sirloin. Then I went home and slept like a baby. I had a good breakfast this morning also. I mean, I didn't look at it as the end of the world although I Flynn is the steadiest player the Mets have. Never a devastating hitter, he has come up with a number of key hits in the club's mighty struggle to reach the .500 mark and he has been nothing less than spectacular around second second baseman. "I can't honestly say his error cost us the game. He didn't give up the triple that followed or any of the
