Walk, Don't Run!

"Walk, don't run, to the nearest exit" has been sound advice for the avoidance of panic ever since enclosed buildings became gathering places for people. Today, this same bit of good advice can be appropriately applied to public attitudes toward environmental problems. We have over 200 milion people compressed into a comparatively limited space - the continental

We have suddenly become conscious of the smoke and pollution resulting from overcrowding. Many have taken no heed of the trash receptacies and no smoking signs. Yet, they have grown fearful and want out. They are showing signs of panic, which is both futile and self-

An example of the futility of panic can be seen in the attitude of many toward nuclear energy. They oppose any and all techonological advances in the use of the atom to meet energy needs out of fear of alleged radiation hazards. Yet, it is becoming increasingly apparent that electricity from nuclear power plants, as well as fossil-fueled power plants, is the most practical

- The director of the Edison Electric Institute, Mr. W. Donham Crawford, has declared that "transportation, air pollution, waste disposal . . . low-cost housing are all areas in which increased use of electric energy can make a substantial contribution . . . However, there is a danger that the honest concern of people over the potential impact of electric utility facilities on the environment may develop into a serious factor in delaying power plant construction and in meeting the nation's power needs."
