Pushme-Pullyou!

There's a mythical animal called a pushmepullyou in the Doolittle books. This creature has two heads at opposite ends of its four-legged body and frequently has difficulty in making any movement because the two heads cannot agree on which direction they should go.

There is a modern day parallel in our federal bureaucracy which has become so large and unco-ordinated that some agencies are pushing in one direction while others are puling the other way. A good case in point is the federal attitude on cigarettes. The surgeon general of the United States has actively campaigned to reduce smoking. The Federal Trade Commission has asked Congress to ban all cigarette advertising on radio and television. As justification for this, FTC says the airwaves should not be used "to promote products that can be harmful to the public in normal use."

If the FTC wins the right to control cigarette advertising, which is aimed at making smoking less attractive and thereby cutting the number of smokers, it will be contrary to the goal of the Treasury Department. That agency now collects more than $2 billion a year in taxes on cigarette sales and as we all know the treasury is looking for ways to raise tax revenue, not reduce it.

There's more absurd contradication among the agencies. The antismoking campaign is being subverted by the Department of Agriculture which has subsidized tobacco farmers since 1938 with price-support payments totaling $80 million. There's also an export-subsidy program for tobacco which has cost $33 million since 1966. And the Department of Agriculture subsidizes promotion of overseas advertising of American cigarettes with counterparts funds at the cost of several hundred thousand dollars.

Thus the taxpayers are supporting antitobacco and protobacco campaigns at the same time.-Houston (Tex.) Chronicle.
