Our Nuclear Double-Dealing

Thanks to the now-famous boom microphone in New Delhi, the world knows that President Carter is going to send Indian Prime Minister Desai a "cold and very blue" letter protesting India's resistance to international safeguards on nuclear technology.

But the world also knows that President Carter is going to sell enriched uranium and heavy water to India, and it needed no fortuitously placed microphone to pick up this bit of intelligence.

Mr. Carter announced it himself, loud and clear and before the Indian Parliament, which erupted with jubilation and, significantly, he announced it scarcely two days after he had consummated a deal in Tehran to sell six to eight nuclear reactors to Iran.

The question arises—why does Mr. Carter wish to accomplish more, the curbing of nuclear proliferation or carrying favor abroad by exporting of nuclear technology?

Curbing nuclear proliferation, of course, has been one of the President's main themes since his inauguration, and we do not doubt that it still is his top priority. But it is not so simple as it appears. It is, in fact, an extremely complex and difficult task.

Timely warning simply means a long enough time period for the United States to become aware of any illicit diversion of plutonium, which is retrieved through reprocessing of spent fuel, and to act against it, before a bomb can be made.

The administration, however, opposed such a tough requirement and haggled with Congress until the timely warning standard fell between the cracks of flexibility this past fall.

Flexibility, said the administration, was what it needed in dealing with other nuclear nations—like India and Iran, for example—and so the bill, as now rewritten, allows reprocessing if, in the judgment of U.S. authorities, it won't increase appreciably the dangers of proliferation.

Around The Clock

ANGLE-WALTERS Tough Talk Came, But It's Belated

WASHINGTON—When a coalition of citizen groups sought last summer to delay the shipment of more than 27,000 pounds of enriched uranium to India, the federal government's ability and ability resulted from this effort.

There was nothing remarkable about the delay. There were nothing remarkable about the delay. There was nothing remarkable about the delay.

But there has been virtually no publicity about the litigation in federal court regarding the United States' exports of hundreds of tons of nuclear fuel during the past decade to India, despite that country's refusal to fully accept the nuclear safeguards.

NEW YORK (UPI)—The American office of the Atomic Energy Commission, according to a scatter-brained fumble-ginger according to recent articles in business periodicals, but the matter deserves a closer look.

Smith and Patricia Donagher of Gramercy Data Systems at Bethpage, N.Y., said most office people who are unproductive are bored with routine and feel unappreciated.

Among these are the diversification of the electronic computer into word processing as well as accounting, converting the secretary from a typist to an administrative assistant and using the videotape or the automatic typewriter for specialized correspondence and writing as well as greater use of dictating machines.
