Burns said the Jacksonville expressing was allegether on fill, for reasons of economy,
"We did find many streets declared as a punit." Burns added, "Its a problem. In ose stretch of 15 blocks without an opening, the city asked for mather underpass — and get it."

The name of this trick in urban renewal.

To tell this story, Mayor Burns has a talk illustrated with slides. It goes about like this. Back in 1963, the downtown riverfront of the city was a falling-down wreck. Marine commerce had moved to newer docks elsewhers. Two blocks on either side of Main Street lay dying. "These four blocks were possibly the worst eyesore in the heart of any city in the land," Burns relates.

The mayor west to the Seaboard Airline Rail-ME PERSUADED the Beaboard to build new freight offices and a new produce market in north-west Jacksonville. The river property sould then be rased and put on the market.

Two blocks were taken by Sears for its huge store. Then, Burns and his sivic team began trying to talk the Atlantic Coast Line into moving its basiquaries down from Wilmington, H. C.

Meantime, the county fathers, in a spirit of cooperation, had planted a handsome new seven-story courthouse and jail on the river next to the site sarmarked for a city hell. The city itself moved, demolishing two ancient warehouses and a pier, and this year began construction of its $3,200,000, 16-story City Hall. Now, the contagion began to work in reverse. Spurred by all this, private industry began to re-metal and rebuild in the downtown section. * * *

OTHER INSURANCE companies followed Productial to the city. Even before its building was well under way, the ACL railroad moved its 1,500 employee and their families. A big trucking firm followed. Then came a new hotel and a face-lifting on an old one. The city was on the more. And so was city half and Mayor Burns.
