One of the few American overseas appropriate, for the organization was "go home" is something called Franklin Book Programs, Inc. Because of it, "Little Women," for example, is a best seller in Pakistan, where it is read in Urdu, and Egyptian university students are using a text in microbiology in their own language of Arabic. This little publicized, private, nonprofit organization was founded in 1952 by a group of publishers and librarians with the modest aim of promoting the translation of Amercan books abroad. That first year, half of dozen titles were published. In 1965, the total had risen to more than 2,700 titles and 50 million copies. Besides major languages like Arabic and Spanish, projected programs include books in such exotic tongues as Yoruba, Hausa and Igbo. Franklin publishes no books itself. however, preaches no propaganda, sells no ideology. Local people direct its overseas offices, now in 11 nations in Asia, Africa and South America, and select the books to be translated. Franklin also trains local people in all phases of the book industry, is sponsoring work on reference books, dictionaries and encyclopedias and, most recently, has become involved in school library projects. This last activity is particularly endeavors that hasn't been attacked named for Benjamin Franklin, who by mobs or told in less forceful ways was not only America's first printer and publisher but the founder of its first public library. Of the $3.5 million the organization spent in 1965, more than half was provided by the foreign governments concerned. The balance came from American foundations and othprivate sources and from the form of local currencies. As Franklin's operations have expanded, so have its aims. Today the immediate one is still to help feed the great hunger for learning that exists in the developing nations. Its long-range objective is to build a thriving book industry and bookreading public as an aid to economic, educational and social development in every country that it enters -and eventually leaves. For these are Yankees who do want to go home but only when they are no longer needed.
