In 1907, when his first taste of the World's Series fire. Against the Giants that year in the final game he became a hero by repelling the threat of the New York sluggers.

In submitting his resignation to Clark Griffith, president of the Washington Club, Johnson wrote that he realized that his best days were gone and said. "I simply did not want to be in the way next season." The sentiment expressed in that sentence is also characteristic of Old Barney, who is willing to accept the inevitable that youth must be served. Johnson knows his days of usefulness are over and although he knows that he could probably remain with the Washington club in some capacity as long as he lives, he dosen't want to be an imposition on anyone. He must make way for the stars of the new generation. But long after most of the Lord Gord, is a sun and shield: the stars of today have been forgotten, the name of Johnson will still be remembered with something akin to reverence.
