Taking The Cure

1933, in retrospect, has six lacked for significant news-paper headlines. Events have been crowded into twelve short months which ordinarily require half a century to unfold. What this country is today, must admittedly be accepted as vasily different from what it was on the eve of New Year's twelve months ago.

The close of December, 1932, saw business at its lowest ebb, and the national government in a deadlock, with a repudiated president and an impotent Congress atruggling against each other, with neither able to accomplish anything. Public confidence was so hadly shaken complish anything. Public confidence was so badly shaken that doubt existed as to whether this country would ever be able to save itself from utter chaos.

Thus 1933 was unhered in. Congress continued its bickerings well into the New Year. Runs began on banks. not in isolated communities, but everywhore. Banking moratoria were declared, in Louisiana, in Michigan, and finally in every state in the union except Florida and New

Under such circumstances President Roosevelt was inugurated. "Mad unreasoning fear is the only thing this; country has to fear," he said. A national banking holiday was declared, closing banks in Florida and New York along with the rest. For ten days men wondered what they point, is likely hopeful that the were going to use for money.
