But the man is vain, St. Louis St. Louis New York he can ride a punch and often does it with his hands down in disdain. Personally I would rather ride a boa constrictor bare back than one of Dempsey's punches, The ride might take me further away than I wanted to go.

Sharkey showed in his fights with Wills McTigue and Malony that he is a gambler at heart when stung he will lash out in a wild exchange of swings evidently imbued with the notion that the man who dared to punch him on the nose had somehow affronted his dignity.

That is just the sort of an idea that must be thrown well out of the fifth story window before stepping in with Dempsey. Like Charley White, the old lightweight, he asked nothing better than that you remain, as is over any period of time and try to slug it out with him, He knows that he has the guns and you ave the greater vulnerability and, barring accidents, he just cannot go wrong.

In view of this state of affairs someone would do Sharkey a positive favor if he fastened his index finger in Jack's button hole long enough to convince him that Dempsey's game is strictly his own, It is dynamite to the man who plays it with him, and as to Syracuse, 16; Newark, 10. that there is not the slightest necessity for Sharkey to do it.

He is admittedly a fast man all right let him prove it for the first four or five rounds. After that he can afford to take occasional flight since the longer the fight goes the less chance Dempsey will have.

There is no friendship as fine as that between those who can oppose each other on principle and still love each other in fact. There is no friendship so true as that which can say to a formed and still as a state of the substitute o as it is unsocial. It is a conspiracy against itself and against the rest of the world. It is a mere blind herding that has no than two pounds at birth, and was higher source than animal instinct and no greater destiny called dull by his teacher in ariththan its own eventual suicide or social apostacy. It is the most metic. Newton told his mother unenlightened, the least flattering, and the most dangerous thing in the world,'

During the next few weeks, there will be many opportunities for the testing of friendship. On August 5 an election well be held to determine primarily whether we shall have five commissioners or three, whether the mayor shall be elected by the people or by the commissioners. On August 16 another world war, in 15 or 20 we again go to the polls to decide whether we want to dig a years, bigger and worse than any, canal from the St. Johns River to the Indian River and dren, everywhere on earth, and whether we think this is the opportune time to begin its con- fought in the air.

In these two elections there will necessarily be many controversies. No two persons always agree on everything; it is seldom that two persons agree exactly on anything, Old friends may oppose each other in one election, but find them- but sometimes human beings deselves together in the other. Enemies may find themselves velop common sense when you together in both elections; friends may likewise be opposed.

But withal, there should be no hard feelings. A man's intelligence and influence enough opinions are his own; no one has a better right to them than he. And if he is afraid to express them, he is a coward and unworthy of the name of friend.

To those who happen to be on the other side, remember that we love "not Caesar less but Rome more."
