The Cry Of Crucify!

Congress has been passing many new laws during the past few months designed to do away with the depression as well as to prevent the re-occurence of another boom and another depression. Such measures as the new securities aw are supposed to protect the public against the sale of worthless stocks and bonds. Such measures as the guarantee of bank deposits are supposed to protect the public against bank failures. From what we read we would conclude that after this Congress there can be no more declin ing stocks, no more failing banks, no more booms, no more depressions.

Bruce Barton, writing recently in a magazine supplement, tells about some of the depressions of old. One of them was known as the South Sea Bubble, another as the Mississippi Scheme, which, strangely enough, was not as much in Mississippi as it was in France. From what Mr. Barton says, the people of those days were troubled with pretty, much the same economic phenomena as they are today. First a lot of worthless securities flooded the market, and then there were runs on banks funny little old banks they were in those days too and then there was hoarding

There were also "public meetings to devise what mean urss were best to be taken to restore public credit", and the government was called in to help. And everybody looked around for something or somebody on whom to blame his troubles. "John Law in Paris", says Mr. Barton, "was almost a god ontil his schame collapsed. Men fought for Introductions to him; titled women were willing to make any sacrifice for his tavor. After the collapse every man and woman cried out for his blood".

And when the South Sea Bubble burst right in the face of London investors, Parliament hastened to appoint investigating committees, much after the manner of modern times, and Lord Stanhope proclaimed at great length "every furthing (something used for money over there) possessed to the criminals (previously known as "lenders", "bankers" The "brain trust" was so used and "empire builders") ought to be confiscated, to make to having their fraduation exer good the public losses".

One wonders why the people would be so foolish as to invest in stocks and bonds floated on some enterprise in the remote South Sea Islands, when right at home in staid old England there were London and Liverpool securities which were tried and tested. Of course the South Sea Islands were new, and their stocks and bonds carried higher rates of interests and offered greater rewards in profits. Many an Englisman of those days had an overwhelming desire "to get rich quick".

"Nobody blamed the credulity and avarice of the people-the degrading lust of gain, which had swallowed up every nobler-quality in the national character or the in ton is that the leans mule shall fatuation which had made the multitude run their heads with such frantic eagerness into the net held out for them by scheming projectors". And then Mr. Barton concludes. "We, the victims, never assess any of the fault against ourselves. We merely turn on those whom we have so renomic Conference almost bagan cently been acclaiming and raise the cry of "Crucify!"
