is than any other Federal Forest Service Region in the United States except one in the Northwest timber belt, according to Joseph C. Kircher, southern regional forester, who says that the income from timber sales for that period amounted to $197,000. This was an increase of $38,000 over a similar period the year before.

Mr. Kircher stated that increased activity in the impermarket was responsible for this appara. He explained that the United States Forest Service makes no effort to stimulate timber sales but waits for applications from lumbermen to take timber out for market. When such applications are received, forest officers determine units and stands that should cut out, and mark the individual trees that are ready for market. The timber is then taken out by private lumbermen under federal supervision.

The Ozark National Forest in Arkansas led all other Southern National Forests in earnings from the sale of timber with receipts amounting to approximately $70,000. The Ouachita Forest in Arkansas and Oklahoma was next with timber earnings of $68,000.
