Computers and electronic devices have given the federal government detailed knowledge about the private lives of millions of citizens and an almost frightening surveillance over their activities.

blonde hair, speaking in a soft North Carolina drawl, doesn't look like someone who has fust a critically-acclaimed film. But Barbara Loden, actress and wife of director Elia Kazan, has done just that. And her movie, "Wanda," won the International Critics' Prize for best film at the 1970 Venice Film "People ask me what right I've got to make a movie." she said. "I tell them I have as much right as anybody. But I was scared to death. I even depied I was directing it for a few

Before she could even be scared, though, Miss Loden had to raise the money for her project. "The film didn't cost much, but when I went around and took people my script I'd never hear from them again," she said. "Then I asked people who make underground films where they got their money, and I found many of them have wealthy families, Finally a friend who was passing through New York asked me what I was doing and I said I was trying to raise money for a film. He just said, 'I'll do it.' "

The actress-filmmaker said she never went to the major studies because, "I didn't want to get into a hassle with them," and she added that one way she was able to keep her costs down was for the film to be non-union. "At one time unions were good," she commented, "But they over-extended themselves and created jobs where they didn't exist. Then all the people got in the way of the art part of the film, and the director would end up just managing the crew. "On my film I had just one cameraman, a sound man and an assistant," she continued. "Some films, like musicals or ones with loss of special effects may need a lot of people, but just to tell a simple story you don't need them.

"Ideally," she said, "you should be able to turn out one little film after the other. That way they could fill all kinds of needs like written material. She also saved money by using non-professionals, "I only used three actors," she noted, "And aside from the cost, I think actors get to the point where they're not real anymore. They're too inhibited, And I think really well-known actors get in the way of the story." As an actress herself, however, Miss Loden won acclaim for her performance as Maggie in the Arthur Miller play, "After the Fall," and her screen cre-
