The judge said he desied Lake Mary City Attorney Gary E. #### The Taxpayers And Education

President Carter wants to provide $1,2 billion in new aid to college students. Part of the money done by raising the family income limit, by which a student is judged eligible for a loan, from $25,000 to

This particular part of the President's proposal no doubt would aid the middle class, but it might also exacertate a problem that's been building recently. That is the problem of student-loan

Most Americans who borrow federal money to go to college eventually pay it back. In the past few years, however, the percentage of those defaulting on their student loans has increased dramatically and now stands at 12.2 percent, with the total default nearing $1 billion.

The reason for this increase in bad accounts is that many people have lost the intention to repay. The new type of defaulter typically declares bankruptcy or changes his address or changes his name—anything, it seems, to avoid filling out a check payable to Uncle Sam.

Over the years the government hasn't bothered much with defaults on student loans, figuring them a cost of doing a public service.

In the past year, however, the rising per-centage of defaulters has prodded the government to act. Delinquent accounts now are with private loan collectors.

It's now illegal to enter bankruptcy proceedings within five years of graduation. And, too, the government now requires colleges to give students information about attrition rates and cost of attendance—a sort of consumer report on the college so that the student, if he's going to borrow federal money, can "know what he's buying into," as one official in the HEW Office of Education put it.

All these changes are fine, and perhaps they will bring down the percentage of defaulters or at least cut into the rate at which they are increasing. Yet it probably would prove more useful, in the long run, if the government now would pause to consider its whole experience as banker to higher education.

Through the loans, the government has enabled more Americans than ever before to go to college, and through grants and other assistance, it has enabled colleges to offer more courses than 'basket-weaving" variety.

Through it all, however, there's been no government concern for the capability of the student nor the quality of the course. And so it happens that nearly 20 years after the government went into the educational banking business, many of the students defaulting on their loans have lost entirely the will to repay- lost it because, as some of them have told the Office of Education, they didn't get anything out of their education.

Could the reason be that some of those now defaulting enrolled in marginal courses, ironically financed by government? Or is it that some of the defaulters weren't educable in the first place? Or that the government has oversold the value of going to college? Or, which is probable, does the reason include all of the above?

Such questions should be asked in Congress.

Agriculture Enrollment, On Increase

There is more to the U.S. farm story than strikes and prices (too low or too high, depending upon whether viewed by the farmer or the supermarket shopper).

-One of the more interesting but little noticed chapters has been taking place on the college campus, where esrellment in schools of agriculture has been climbing steadily.

Nationwide ag school enrellment as of the Fall 1977 registration was $8,519, according to the annual count taken by Iowa State University's College of Agriculture.

This figure may not seem particularly i ressive in comparison with the hundreds of thousands which are customary in engineering, business and the social sciences. But represents almost a doubling in the numbers of ag students in less than a decade (some 54,000 in 1979), a tripling in a quarter of a century (less than 35,000 in 1963). college enrollments, a continuing decline in the number of U.S. farms and size of the farm population and what has generally been
